DES MOINES OFFICE

"I'm somebody who has multiple tools in my tool kit, where I can solve problems in a lot of different ways," attorney Adam Humes says.

His well-rounded approach comes from years of experience working for Iowa elected officials and government agencies. His tax, tax controversy, and administrative law practice benefits from his deep insights into the workings of government agencies. Whether the tax problem calls for litigation, a law change, an administrative solution, settlement, or another answer, Adam looks at all the possibilities.

"I have a lot of experience approaching problem-solving from different angles," Adam says. He's fully prepared to litigate cases and handle formal disputes with government agencies. He's also ready to take a broader view.

Knowledgeable and a solution seeker, Adam understands the client's immediate problem. He also can offer guidance on the bigger-picture perspective. "A lot of my work is looking at problem-solving from the perspective of also solving the source of a particular conflict or dispute. Sometimes that is in the law itself. Sometimes it calls for changes to a client's procedures," he says. "I enjoy working with clients to resolve their current tax disputes while offering guidance to avoid future problems."

At the Iowa Department of Revenue and the Iowa Attorney General's Office, Adam handled a diverse variety of tax and nontax cases. He worked as a front-line attorney, a deputy director, and a supervisor. His work included overseeing compliance programs, litigating civil and administrative cases, rulemaking, and legislation. "I've seen things full circle in terms of how tax agencies work and how state government agencies work as well," he says.

That experience helps him see advantages to his clients in considering the full range of solutions in any given case. He's seen advocates focus solely on legislative solutions. He's seen attorneys rely too much on litigated solutions. "In tax, many disputes require some combination of those or the ability to pick and choose the best tool to be able to solve a problem," Adam says. "That's the kind of person who can best represent clients in front of state agencies. The thing that characterizes my practice is somebody who thinks about problem-solving in a number of different ways—from a litigation perspective and also from a policy and legislative and administrative perspective. It important to understand the perspective and motivations of all parties involved in a dispute."

The specialized nature of tax law fascinates Adam. He appreciates the challenge of complex cases with sophisticated clients and counsel. He finds the wide-ranging issues interesting. "Tax issues are everywhere and they impact everyone," Adam says. "Tax is a part of countless decisions individuals and businesses make every day. I enjoy working in an area that is vitally important to my clients."

Adam's interest in how government operates was his inspiration to attend law school. In addition to tax law, administrative law captured his attention. "It is how government agencies work and how folks can challenge decisions the government agencies make," Adams says. "I found that to be the most interesting area to practice in."

Tax law, by its nature, is complex. Adam steps up to help clients and decision-makers grasp difficult concepts. "I excel at explaining these concepts both to tax experts, who are well-versed in it, and to generalists, such as judges, policymakers, or elected officials," he says.
